ARCH EXTERMINATOR DENIES RESPONSIBILITY FOR PERSECUTING JEWS; DISCLAIMS AUTHORITY TO MAKE ATROCIOUS DECISIONS; POSES AS SMALL MAN IN MILITARY MACHINE; EXPLAINS AWAY SPECIAL POWER; SAYS HE HAD NO ROLE IN CAMPS

At his trial in Jerusalem, Adolf Eichmann, Nazi killer, continued to deny responsibility for persecuting the Jews, endlessly explaining by detailed examination of a long succession of prosecution documents that others — not he — had the responsibility and the culpability for various anti-Jewish actions described in these papers.

He was present when the ghetto of Lodz in Poland was changed into an infamous concentration camp, he admitted, but said that he was there in a kind of symbolic presence only, representing his superiors, says the New York Herald Tribune. He was questioned by his attorney about his moves against a certain Jewish woman who was the widow of an Italian national, and he tried to wriggle out of responsibility for allowing her to go to her death by insisting that S. S. (Nazi Elite Guard) leader Heinrich Himmler's orders were so strict he could not have done otherwise.

He devoted several hours to telling how he was an administrator of the Nazi office for Jewish emigration in Vienna, but, even so, had no decision-making responsibility.

Although he was getting telegrams notifying him about the progress of conflagrations touched off by Nazi street gangs on the night of terror in Germany and Austria following the assassination in Paris of an embassy official in November, 1938, he explained these were only to warn him so he could save the Jewish archives in the institutions.

The prosecution submitted documents that indicated Eichmann had been zealous above and beyond the call of duty in rounding up Hungarian Jews. The documents also showed that Eichmann had tried to circumvent decisions by S. S. (Elite Guard) Reichsfuehrer Heinrich Himmler to cease the deportations.

This was during the closing months of war, when Himmler foresaw a German defeat and was anxiously presenting himself as a moderate with whom the Allies could negotiate peace.

For those who reject both the Hausner version of Eichmann as the arch exterminator and the Servatius version of the prisoner as a lowly cog in a military machine, there is a third image.

This image was born recently when a Berlin pastor called Eichmann a "landsknecht." The witness, Dean Heinrich Karl Ernst Grueber of the Evangelical Church, explained that "landsknecht" meant a mercenary, a soldier without conscience.

Some observers believe that if this trial is to have any lasting admonitory effect it would be better to label Eichmann as an active "landsknecht," the type of man who could pop up in any society, says the New York Herald Tribune. This would have a better effect, it is believed, than labeling him a monster of the rank of Hitler and Himmler.

Adolf Eichmann disclaimed responsibility for one of the cruellest incidents of World War II, the shipping of 4,000 Jewish children from France to the gas chambers of Auschwitz.

The former Gestapo officer laid the blame for all anti-Jewish acts in occupied France on Heinrich Himmler, the Nazi security chief, and on the Nazi Foreign Ministry. Eichmann is charged with having directed the murder of millions of Jews.

He admitted that he had "passed on" to his deputy in Paris the order to send the children to the death camp in Poland. But, he said, the order came from a superior, someone even higher than Lieut. Gen. Heinrich Mueller, head of the Gestapo.

Eichmann said this was shown by the fact that it took him eleven days to reply to an urgent request for instructions on what to do with the children at Drancy concentration camp near Paris. He said that he put it up to Mueller and that apparently Mueller went to Himmler for a decision.

Eichmann asserted that his office, the Jewish affairs department of the Gestapo, did not have the authority to decide the fate of the children.

Even though Himmler ordered the deportation of all Jews, young and old, from occupied France, Eichmann said, his office had only intermediary functions and lacked the power of decision when someone questioned a general directive, says the New York Times. The sallow prisoner was emphatic in denying a Red Cross report that he held a "key position" in the administration of Nazi concentration camps.

This report, by Paul Dunand of the Swiss Red Cross, was submitted by the prosecution early in the trial to show that Eichmann had been more extreme than Himmler in seeking the extermination of the Jews. Mr. Dunand, describing a visit a few weeks before the war ended to Theresienstadt, a model ghetto, said Eichmann was critical of Himmler's softer measures.

When asked about the Dunand report, Eichmann denied in a loud, harsh voice that he never had a major role in camp administration. "This does not correspond to the truth," he said. "I had no role whatsoever, I had no functions. I had no authority. I would not have entertained the thought of criticizing my superiors in the presence of foreigners," he added primly.

Adolf Eichmann denied that he originated the Nazi actions against Jews in France during the occupation. He supported his statement with what the defense called the basic document on the Jewish persecutions there.

This was a letter from Nazi Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop saying that Hitler himself had appointed the German Ambassador, Otto Abetz, as the exclusive man in charge of all problems in occupied and unoccupied France.

Eichmann made an extraordinary effort to disclaim any authority whatever in dealing with Jews in France except within the framework of his own limited Bureau IV-B-4 affairs, where he only acted on instructions from above.

In a number of instances brought up by Dr. Robert Servatius, Eichmann's West German lawyer, he was able to rely on documentation. But in many other cases it came down to his word of denial against the documentary allegations, says the New York Herald Tribune. Before getting into his activities in France, Eichmann made a challenging denial on his own naked word of the International Red Cross report.

It depicted him as a high-ranking power in the concentration camp set-ups and as one who personally opposed a new humane program toward the Jews initiated by Gestapo leader Himmler at the same time the German defeat seemed likely.

As to having influence in the concentration camps, Eichmann said he had no role, no functions and no authority there. And as to opposing Himmler, he said it was ridiculous to think he would have aired such views to members of a foreign delegation inspecting a concentration camp, in this case Theresienstadt in Czechoslovakia.

Eichmann also lacked supporting documents, and so had to rely on his own word, in trying to get out from under the prosecution's charges that he caused the round-up of the 4,000 French children and their deportation to the concentration camp of Drancy and their presumed eventual extermination.

The 4,000 children were separated from their parents and taken to Drancy. An earlier witness at the trial, Prof. George Wellers, of the Sorbonne, testified how the children had been dragged screaming from their verminous rooms at Drancy to be herded into freight cars bound for Auschwitz.

"I was not the man to decide this," Eichmann said. He said that he was sent to Paris in July, 1942, as Himmler's emissary to transmit orders for deporting Jews. Then, in September, after the children had been taken to Auschwitz, Himmler ordered a halt in the deportations from France.

Eichmann was confronted with a document reporting on a conversation he had in July, 1942, with two other S. S. (Nazi Elite Guard) officials — one of them Theodor Dannecker, who was really in charge of the evacuation of Jews from France, according to Eichmann.

In this conversation Eichmann was said to have made the decision that the children's transports could begin to roll again as soon as arrangements in the east were completed. Eichmann's lawyer asked him what he had to say about this document. He replied:

"Himmler ordered the deportation of all Jews from France, without any limitations or reservations. The French police seized, among others, children as well. Therefore, they asked what should be done with the children? In answer to this question I wrote what appears in this document."

But, Eichmann explained, there was a lapse of the eleven days between the time the question was put to him in a telegram and the time he made the supposed decision, says the New York Herald Tribune. That meant, he asserted, that he first had to ask his superiors in Berlin for instructions.

"The very fact that it took eleven days until a decision and directive was given, proves that I had to pass on the question to my superiors," he said.

Eichmann's entire defense with respect to the deportations in France, and the anti-Jewish laws, flowed from the von Ribbentrop letter, addressed to the head of the German security forces, which contained among much detail on Nazi authority in France this sentence: "The Fuehrer instructed, explicitly, in this matter that only and exclusively the Ambassador, Abetz, will be the man charged to deal with all problems in occupied and unoccupied France."

Then the defense produced a letter from Eichmann's superior, Richard Heydrich, dated Sept. 20, 1940. In the letter, Heydrich agreed to the Abetz proposals that no more Jews be permitted into France, that Jews be removed from occupied France and ways be found to confiscate their property.

The defense brought forward other documents to show that Abetz moved to deprive Jews of their nationality on the ground of race alone, and that Himmler himself had ordered concentration camps to be set up for the final solution of the Jewish problem.

In an effort to rebut the prosecution's charge that the S. S. official, Dannecker, was one of Eichmann's lieutenants in anti-Jewish actions in France, Eichmann testified that Dannecker and his later successor, Heinz Roethke, operated independently of himself.

"I could neither receive any direct reports from Dannecker nor could I give him any instructions," he said. He explained that any communication between them had to come indirectly through official channels in Berlin.

He said the final solution at the time of the first actions against the Jews in France was not extermination, but the plan to send Jews to settle in Madagascar, says the New York Herald Tribune. He also testified that after the assassination of his superior, Heydrich, by Czech partisans in 1942, Himmler ordered that the line to be followed should be more stern and radical, and this was one of the factors, he said, in causing the deportations of the Jewish children.

Eichmann tried to explain away some documents which indicated on their face, as he admitted, that he seemed to be cracking down on the Jews on his own authority. But actually, he protested, he was merely making implementing orders in accordance with the major directives of Himmler, who had ordered all Jews to be deported from France as soon as possible, and of his immediate superior, Heinrich Mueller, who had directed that 100,000 Jews be shipped out quickly.

The Eichmann defense brought out that by March, 1942, the Madagascar plan for resettling European Jews — a plan which Eichmann asserts he favored heart and soul — was being dropped.

A document was submitted showing that the German Ambassador Abetz had visited Hitler to discuss a plan to seek territorial solution of the problem in the eastern territories. The result was that agreement was obtained at the top level to start the expulsion of Jews from France to the east as soon as transport was available.

Eichmann admitted that the order implementing this went to three authorities, one of which was his, but only because it was to be his job to arrange for the transport, says the New York Herald Tribune. A report from the SS deputy, Roethke, in Paris to Eichmann's office in Berlin on Sept. 23, 1942, told about the departure of a transport and added, "The brother of the one-time French Prime Minister, Leon Blum, was deported on today's train."

Commenting on this reference to Rene Blum, Eichmann said only Himmler could have intervened to save Blum and that he himself had no authority whatever.

He was asked about the much-quoted letter from Himmler to a subordinate in December, 1942, directing that French, Hungarian, and Rumanian Jews who had rich or influential relatives in the United States should be concentrated together and held as valuable hostages for possible future use.

Eichmann accused Otto Abetz, Nazi Ambassador to France, of having intensified the anti-Jewish campaign. He said Abetz visited Hitler to press for the removal of all Jews in the concentration camps of France, says the New York Times. Hitler agreed, Eichmann said, and as soon as transport was available thousands of foreign and stateless Jews were rounded up.

Dr. Servatius showed Eichmann a document that said Helmut Knochen, security police commander for northern France and Belgium, had discussed the deportation of French Jews with Eichmann in February, 1943. Commenting on this, Eichmann said:

"At first glance it would appear that I acted contrary to Himmler's orders and tried to maintain deportations on my own initiative. However, other documents show that Himmler sent Gen. Kurt Daluege to Paris and Marseilles to look into the difficulties . . . and he then changed his mind. I received an order to go to Paris and inform Knochen of the order to deport French Jews."

The order to deport French nationals was opposed by the Vichy Government and quietly sabotaged by the French police.

Eichmann recalled also "the uncooperative attitude" of the Italians in the part of France occupied by Italy.

Dr. Servatius quoted a message sent to security police chiefs in France, The Netherlands, and Belgium in April, 1943, by Maj. Rolf Guenther, of Eichmann's office, ordering that all Jews being deported be kept in ignorance of their destination.

The message explained that this was at the request of the Auschwitz camp administration, which wanted the deportees docile on their arrival.

Dr. Servatius asked why these instructions had been issued and Eichmann began a rambling reply that annoyed the judges. There was a burst of laughter, quickly squelched, when Eichmann complained of a lapse of memory.

"Eighteen years have passed," he said. "After all, I am testifying here under oath. I do not want to surmise or conjecture."

There were occasional growls from the gallery when Eichmann pleaded that he was only acting on orders from above, says the New York Times. Once an elderly, bearded Jew half rose from his seat and muttered, "There he goes again with his superiors." Neighbors hauled him down.

Documents, which the prosecutor said proved Eichmann's connection with atrocities in Eastern Europe, were submitted by Attorney Gen-

CLASS IN COOKERY

CINNAMON YEAST ROLLS

one package dry yeast
one teaspoon sugar
one-quarter cup sugar
one-half teaspoon salt
cinnamon
seedless raisins
one-half cup warm milk
one-half cup butter
one egg
two and one-half cups sifted all-purpose flour
brown sugar
melted butter

Dissolve one teaspoon sugar in warm milk. Sprinkle yeast over the milk and let stand for ten minutes and then stir. Cream half-cup butter, sugar, salt until fluffy. Beat in egg until blended. Alternately stir in the flour and yeast mixture beginning and ending with flour. Knead well. Brush top of dough with salad oil to prevent from sticking to bowl. Cover and let rise until doubled; this should take two hours. When doubled, punch down. Divide dough in two equal parts and roll out to a one-quarter inch thickness. Spread with melted butter; sprinkle liberally with cinnamon to taste, brown sugar, and seedless raisins. Roll up as for a log and cut into two-inch slices. Set on a greased cookie sheet, in the same position as when you were slicing it. Sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon mixture. Cover with waxed paper and let stand until the rolls have doubled in size, about one hour. Bake at 350 degrees for thirty minutes or until golden brown.

Mrs. S. Goldreich.
1 Brixton Terrace, Toronto.

BAKED MACKEREL AND POTATOES

In a large, shallow, baking dish, melt two tablespoons butter. Add one cup milk, one teaspoon ginger, and salt and pepper to taste. Cut mackerel in serving pieces and place in milk mixture. Add whole, medium-sized, peeled potatoes. If necessary add more milk until fish is not quite covered. Bake at 350 degrees until milk is reduced to half. Serve with this white sauce:

In a bowl mix together:

one tablespoon potato flour
one cup milk
one tablespoon butter
salt and pepper

Pour this over fish and continue to bake until potatoes are tender and sauce is golden brown.

WHAT MAKES A PARTY?
Well, first of all, good company makes a party. Good food, good drink, and good music all help. We can't provide the food, we don't have a liquor licence, and it's up to you to provide the company. But we do know how to provide the entertainment — that's our business.
If you want to be lavish, you could hire us to play Beethoven. We've done it before. But most people like their parties to have relaxing, happy, entertaining music. We can give you just what you want — big bands, little bands, singers, instrumentalists, and dancers.
As we said, that's our business. Why not call us?

ARCH EXTERMINATOR DENIES RESPONSIBILITY FOR PERSECUTING JEWS

eral Gideon Hausner, earlier in the trial. Among these was a letter from Dr. Ernst Wetzel of the Ministry for Occupied Areas in the East. This letter, which Dr. Wetzel sent Oct. 25, 1941, to the Reich Commissioner of the Eastern Territories, told of arrangements to supply apparatus to exterminate people with poison gas.

Dr. Wetzel wrote that he had coordinated matters with Victor Brack, an official in Hitler's Chancellery, who had a leading role in the Nazis' "euthanasia" program for the chronic sick and mentally ill. Brack later became technical adviser on gas chambers in concentration camps.

Eichmann, who was in charge of the Gestapo (secret police) section assigned to the extermination of Jews, had agreed to a pilot project for gas chambers, the Wetzel letter said. Eichmann noted, the document said, that camps for Jews were to be set up in Riga and Minsk.

"As the matter stands, there are no reservations about getting rid of those Jews incapable of work by means of the Brack method," the letter added.

Mr. Hausner told the court earlier in the trial that Eichmann, confronted with the document during earlier police interrogation, had confirmed that "everything in it was true." The prosecutor said that attached to the letter was a handwritten document initialed by Eichmann, suggesting that the gassing of Jews was preferable to mass shootings.

Mr. Hausner recalled that Eichmann had said he had seen Jews killed in poison-gas trucks near Chelmnow in Poland before gas chambers were built, says the New York Times. Later there was much correspondence over camouflaging the trucks to look like little cottages with windows so that Jews would enter more willingly, he said.

Other documents, submitted earlier in the trial, told of Eichmann's unrelenting efforts to prevent the escape of Jews who had foreign passports from eastern territories. He advised the German Foreign Minister to resist pressure from Argentina, Italy and Rumania on behalf of their nationals, warning that these Jews, once free of Nazi control, would spread atrocity stories about Germany.

Mr. Hausner, in announcing Israel's willingness to receive Dr. Hoettl and Herr Huppenkothen, said the only thing he knew against them was their membership in the elite guard, which was designated a criminal organization by the Nuremburg war crimes trials.

Although this would make them liable to seven year's imprisonment under Israel's law for the punishment of Nazis and Nazi collaborators, Mr. Hausner had pledged that they would not be brought to trial in Israel.

This assurance was not quite enough for Dr. Robert Servatius, Eichmann's West German defense counsel. Dr. Servatius inquired politely whether Dr. Hoettl and Herr Huppenkothen would be able to leave Israel, "even if, in cross-examination, some incriminating point might appear."

"No, they will not be brought to justice for anything they did in the past," Mr. Hausner said.

Judge Benyamin Halevi noted that the two former Nazis were not technically defense witnesses. Dr. Servatius wanted them brought to Israel for cross-examination on declarations they made fifteen years ago at Nuremburg.

The judge made this point after Mr. Hausner said he had been told by the defense that Dr. Hoettl was the "most important witness" for Eichmann, says the New York Times. Dr. Hoettl's affidavit at Nuremberg was considered important by Mr. Hausner, earlier in the trial because it attributed to Eichmann the statement that 4,000,000 Jews had been killed in extermination camps and that 2,000,000 others had been shot by the Einsatzgruppen, the Nazi operational units that slaughtered Jews and Gypsies.

"I actually fired the first shot of the Second World War. I pulled the trigger three years before the war really started, and more than five years before Jews went to their doom in gas chambers and extermination camps. But I knew even then, at that early date, that I was striking a blow for the honor and liberty of my people. By killing Wilhelm Gustloff, the Nazi leader in Switzerland, I redeemed my own conscience. Twenty-five years have passed since that day but I still have no regrets other than I did not kill other Nazi leaders as well. Had I known in advance what the consequences of my action were going to be, I would have done it again and again, without a moment's hesitation."

The man who spoke these words was David Frankfurter, as we met in his modest apartment in the Ramat-Gan suburb of Tel Aviv. This is his story.

On February 4, 1936, as dusk was gathering over the snow-covered ridges of the Swiss Alps, a series of pistol shots shattered the calm of Davos, a resort in the mountains of southeastern Switzerland. A heavy-set German, blood gushing from his chest, crumpled on the rug in front of his writing desk. Crouching over the Nazi's body was 26-year-old David Frankfurter, the first avenger of the Jewish people against the Nazis.

Twenty-five years later, I shook the hand which killed Wilhelm Gustloff. Fifty-year-old David Frankfurter, now an Israeli Government official, looks as if he had no worry in the world, except grocery bills, new furniture for his sitting room, and a new dress for his wife. A receding hairline and wrinkles around the eyes, heavier jowls, and slightly stooped shoulders mark the passage of time.

Recalling the past, Frankfurter observed in his quiet matter-of-fact voice: "Few people at that time believed that the Nazis really meant to exterminate all Jews. In fact, as shown by captured German documents and confesions of Nazi war criminals, Hitler and his gang did not adopt the idea of actual physical annihilation of the Jewish people until 1941. Till then, the Nazis simply meant to eliminate all Jews from the areas under German control or occupation by economic strangulation, legal oppression, and deportation, with occasional murders, pogroms, and torture to speed up this process."

He paused and his voice rose in emphasis: "But I knew that Hitler meant what he said as soon as he came to power. Killing Wilhelm Gustloff was both a success and a failure as far as I was concerned. Personally, it was for me an act of spiritual redemption. I knew that I had done my best in the struggle against Naxism. Had other Jews followed my example, I am sure that events would have taken another course. But the Jewish people failed to see the significance of my action. They remained passive until they were herded into gas chambers and crematoria. This is the reason why I say my action was a failure. It failed to arouse the Jewish people and left things exactly as they were before."

After keeping silent for 25 years, David Frankfurter decided to speak up on the eve of Adolf Eichmann's trial. What particularly excited him was the reiterated statement that the trial would enable the new Germany to grasp the magnitude of its crimes and thus be impelled to reform. "Foolish Jews are deluding themselves again," David Frankfurter said heatedly. "They do not understand that even if a wolf disguises himself as a lamb he remains a wolf. The Germans have not changed. They remain the same Germans they were under Bismarck, under the Kaiser, and under Hitler. Current political realities and their own economic prosperity put them on their good behavior for the time being. But it will take generations to determine whether the nature of Germany has changed. Personally, I do not believe it has."

Dr. Moshe Frankfurter, David's father, was the rabbi of a small Jewish community in northern Yugoslavia. He gave his son a traditional Jewish education, coupled with modern European learning. In 1929, at the age of 19, David left his parents' home to study medicine at the famed university of Leipzig, Germany. The Nazis under Hitler were bidding for power, and that feeble democratic German state, the Weimar Republic, did nothing to oppose them.

In 1933, Hitler was elected leader of Germany. "He was no usurper of power," Frankfurter points out, "and people seem to forget today that Hitler attained power not by any civil war or revolution but through a legal election in which he won a clear majority of the vote. The German nation wanted him as their leader."

By that time, Jewish students at German colleges and universities were already being beaten up by Nazi thugs. But his Yugoslav passport protected David who applied for a transfer to Frankfurt. He enrolled at the Frankfurt University but neglected his studies. His real mission, as he conceived it, was to organize resistance among the Frankfurt Jews, then Germany's oldest and most prosperous Jewish community.

He was ridiculed and laughed out of Jewish homes. People thought him a crackpot. No one believed the Nazis were serious about their anti-Jewish program. Not even when Nazi storm troopers picketed Jewish shops and stores, and one anti-Jewish law followed another, did the Jews of Germany wake up to the full extent of the danger threatening them.

Only one elderly Jew accepted David's views without hesitation. His son had been killed by the Nazis in one of the first concentration camps, and he himself had been tortured by Gestapo thugs until his body was broken and he was released from jail as a cripple. After his release, he obtained a pistol and decided to kill Hermann Goering, who was then in charge of organizing the Nazi Gestapo and concentration camps. But his injuries prevented him from carrying out the plan. On his deathbed, the elderly Jew handed over the gun to David Frankfurter and begged him to avenge the suffering of the Jewish people by killing Goering during his forthcoming visit to Frankfurt.

David hid the gun in the inside pocket of his jacket and began the wait for Goering's arrival at the railroad station. A few days later, he saw a cordon of SS and police troopers thrown around the station square. He moved from Kaiserstrasse, where he was strolling with the gun under his jacket, towards the station buildings, pushing the crowds towards the main entrance. Goering and his entourage were already visible at a short distance, when a German police officer became suspicious of David. He moved to intercept him, but the young Jewish student noticed the Nazi, dived back into the crowd and disappeared among the cheering Germans.

Still, it was dangerous to remain in Frankfurt. David packed up and left for Switzerland, where he enrolled at the University of Berne. This was in 1935, years before the world and the Jewish people became aware of the Nazi danger. At that time, the Germans were considering taking over Switzerland as well as Austria. "All German speaking countries belong to Greater Germany," Hitler told his generals and party gauleiters.

Gauleiter Wilhelm Gustloff, a Nazi thug from the early beer-hall brawling days, was sent by Hitler to Switzerland, to organize pro-German groups, Nazi underground cells and a fifth-column to soften up the country for an eventual German invasion. He had set up his headquarters in Davos, a skiing resort in southeastern Switzerland. Frankfurter heard Gustloff addressing one of the pro-Nazi meetings in Switzerland. He understood that the Germans really meant to invade the quiet country, the last refuge of fugitive Jews in Central Europe.

In the first days of February 1936, Frankfurter went by train from Berne to Davos, registered at a local hotel and looked up Gustloff's address in the telephone directory. He then proceeded to that address and rang the bell of the Nazi leader's apartment. The Nazi himself opened the door. "What do you want?" he asked sharply. "Are you Wilhelm Gustloff?" "Yes," he answered and repeated impatiently, "what do you want?"

Before Gustloff could speak further, Frankfurter drew his gun and fired three shots into the German. Gustloff staggered back towards his desk and groped for the telephone. Frankfurter shot him again and fled but not before he was seen by Frau Gustloff, the Nazi's widow, who had rushed into the corridor and seen him fire the last shot into her husband's body.

About an hour later, when Frankfurter surrendered to the Swiss police, she was called to identify her husband's killer. "Yes, it is he," she told the police. Turning to Frankfurter, she burst out: "How could you kill my husband? What did he do to you? You look so honest, and yet you are a murderer!"

"Frau Gustloff," Frankfurter replied proudly, "I am a Jew, and that explains everything. . . ."

Frankfurter was sentenced to 18 years in jail. As it turned out, his incarceration in a Swiss prison saved his life, because the infuriated Nazis sent trained gunmen to kill him, or kidnap him to Germany.

The Nazis honored the slain man. They built a warship and named it Wilhelm Gustloff. During the Second World War, a special Jew-killing Nazi formation, known as SS Polizei-Regiment Wilhelm Gustloff, was set up to carry out massacres of Jews and punitive expeditions against ghettos.

Frankfurter was safe and active in the Swiss jail. He learned gardening, tailoring, and bookkeeping. But he was unhappy, not so much because he was a prisoner, but because the Jews of Switzerland opposed his wishes for a re-trial. They wanted him to ask for clemency and conditional release, without bringing up the Gustloff assassination once again before the courts. Only the Swiss themselves appreciated Frankfurter's action. "You rid Switzerland of a poisonous black spider who was enmeshing us in a web of Nazi conspiracy and intrigue," one of the prison wardens told Frankfurter.

In 1945, after Germany's surrender and after he had served nine years of his 18-year sentence, Frankfurter was pardoned by the legislative council of southeastern Switzerland, by a majority of 78 to 12. On his release he found that his father had been executed by the Germans in 1941, but that his brother had survived the war in one of the concentration camps.

Both Frankfurter brothers emigrated to Israel. In Jerusalem, the Jewish Agency appointed David chief of its war invalids rehabilitation section. He fell in love with an Israeli social worker in one of the immigration transit camps and married her. They moved to Tel Aviv, where David entered the government civil service. He rather enjoyed being unknown and forgotten. Few people remembered the events of 1936. For most people the events of 1936 were over-shadowed by the Second World War, the holocaust which nearly wiped out the Jews of Europe.

Actually, it was not only the impending Eichmann trial which made Frankfurter speak up against the "blindness of his people." What moved him to break his silence was a news item carried by the local papers which reported that some 20,000 Israelis had left their country to resettle in Germany.

"It will take another Hitler to teach them their lesson, but I doubt if they'll ever learn."
